A Reproducible Protocol to Isolate a Characterized Population of Adult Feline Progenitor Cells

These investigators are looking for new ways to create stem cells for therapeutic use. They developed a new, more rapid method for harvesting stem cells for use as stem cells from tissue collected at castration. They also were able to propagate these cells in the laboratory setting and increase the population significantly from what was harvested. These cells showed the ability to become different cell types like bone and cartilage, a key quality of stem cells. This technique holds promise for producing therapeutic levels of stem cells for treating a variety of disease conditions.
